The Singapore Heritage Society (SHS) has been working on the ground in Chinatown for the last three years, doing community building and raising cultural awareness as a response to gentrification and over-commercialization of the neighbourhood, which has created challenges for local small enterprises and food stalls due to ever-increasing rents. Community relationships and services suffer when long-standing local businesses close down. This project aims to explore the role that non-commercial property owners in the area, clan associations, and endowment asset management companies, might be able to play in addressing community needs for space.
