

EVENING TALK

WHY THE CRASH IN CHINA'S ECONOMY IS IMMINENT... AND WHY IT'S NOT GOING TO HAPPEN

Is the success story on China's economy finally at an end? 2016 might suggest yes, thereby vindicating over 30 straight years of prediction failure by some of the most insightful of Western economic observers. If so, why now and not earlier? What does evidence indicate for the effects on ASEAN or indeed about the predicted crash and hard landing in China itself?

ABOUT THE SPEAKER

Prof Danny Quah

Tan Chin Tuan Visiting Professor, Economics Department, NUS; Director, Saw Swee Hock Southeast Asia Centre, LSE; Professor of Economics and International Development, LSE

Danny Quah is Professor of Economics and International Development at the London School of Economics and Political Science, and Director of the Saw Swee Hock Southeast Asia Centre at LSE's Institute of Global Affairs. He had previously served as LSE's Head of Department for Economics, and Council Member on Malaysia's National Economic Advisory Council.

Quah is Tan Chin Tuan Visiting Professor at the National University of Singapore, and lectures regularly at Peking University. He studied at Princeton, Minnesota, and Harvard, and was Assistant Professor in the Economics Department at MIT before joining LSE.

Quah gave the third LSE-NUS lecture in 2013, TEDx talks in 2014 and 2012, and the Inaugural LSE Big Questions Lecture in 2011. His current research is on an economic approach to world order - global power shift and the rise of the east.
