CONCEPT

Singapore has achieved a remarkable standard of living since gaining independence some 53 years ago. The city-state has one of the highest Gross Domestic Product per capita in the world, surpassing that of Japan, United Kingdom, and Australia (The World Bank, 2017). On the social front, the multi-racial and multi-religious communities in this country have maintained a largely harmonious relationship for decades, a rare feat in an increasingly fractious sea of identities.

Notwithstanding these accolades, there are nascent signs that the city-state is facing greater and more volatile headwinds in the years to come. What has been particularly noticeable is the proliferation of new schisms arising from different lifestyles, values and wealth. These fault lines are symptoms of a deteriorating sense of “togetherness” in a rapidly evolving world.

For Singapore as a city-state to continue to prosper, there is an imperative to forge a new social compact that is not zero-sum based and to reach a consensus in managing the plurality of differences. The goal of this conference is therefore to discuss the new Singapore polity that will be inclusive for all.

PANEL II Emerging Forms of Social Identities and Social Formation

This panel identifies the challenges created by emerging forms of social identities including those shaped by new intersectionalities that fall outside of our traditional policy frameworks. The panel will discuss the future of the Singapore identity discourse and what it means to be different. Ultimately, the focus will be on the processes required for building national unity and the search for a new social compact. Examples of emerging social identities are those created by non-CMI resident communities such as the Filipinos and Myanmarese, Caucasian PRs, unmarried single-parent families,

LGBTQ marital unions, same gender family structures, surrogate offspring and separatist religious identities.

PANEL III Politics of Diversity Management

This panel discusses how reconstituted social groups and identities have resulted in changing ideologies and contending political demands. The fluid socio-demographic landscape may, however, lead to “push-backs” between competing social camps. How do we then balance these opposing demands so as to create an environment for constructive dialogue? Are the current policies and frameworks sufficiently flexible and porous to accommodate the diversity of these “voices”? What policy levers can we rely on to bring us back as one? Opposing groups are formed by situations such as those brought about by the class divide, the longevity divide, inter-ethnic/intra-ethnic divide, Interfaith/Intra-faith divide, political divide, the divide over sexual orientations, the divide over disabilities/different abilities and even neighbourhood divides.
